Night.

The earth is veiled in twilight gray,
Day wings her flight;
The worshipped sun is borne away
On blushing waves of amber light;
Come then, thou Maid, and be our Queen
Nought shall disturb thy reign screne,
O dark-eyed Night! The weary earth mourns not the death
Of busy day;
The sighing wind now holds her breath,
To list to Phiomela's lay;
And Night-wooed buds, asleep since morn,
Awake, and hasten to adorn
The regal way.

'Mid dusky spheres is raised for thee
A throne on high;
The budding stars await to see,
The crescent moon come gliding by.
Then they'll entwine thy raven hair;
And Cynthia on thy bosom fair
Will gently lie.

Leve lights his lamp, then steals away
To Psyche's bower:
And Hope, who twines her wreath by day,
Now hides in heart of drowsy flower.
Come, wave thy strange enchanted wand,
In magic circles o'er the land,
From thy dark tower. I hear the tread of silver feet.
O coming Night!
Thou turnest like a vision sweet,
The misty darkness into light.
I see thee new, and at thy side
Is gliding sleep—the dreamy-eyed—Thrice welcome Night!
